Back to back Bin Ladin audio releases PI Online Gauges Reaction on the Street

A speech attributed to Bin Ladin was released on Monday, followed on Tuesday with the release of second recording. In contrast to his previous style, these messages were not laced with rhetoric threatening the West. In fact, Bin Ladin acknowledges that mistakes were made and essentially calls on all Mujahidin to put aside their differences, shed any nationalistic and tribal affiliations and unite for the sake of the Ummah. In general, comments in the Arab media and on Islamic sites were not receptive. Both sides – those who wanted the insurgency to fail and those who championed it – saw the message as “too little too late.”

There were also those who questioned the timing of Monday’s message. One poster claimed that, in the background of another propaganda video issued a month ago,¹ Bin Ladin is heard making statements identical to those heard in a portion of Monday’s release. PI Online has confirmed that the identical statements are heard in both tapes, but was unable to determine if it was the same tape being “recycled” or Bin Ladin repeating the same passage on two separate occasions.

In Tuesday’s message, Bin Ladin asked the Mujahidin to join the fight against the invading crusaders in the Sudan. Bin Ladin appears to want to switch the focus of jihad from Iraq to other parts of the Middle East, by inciting fighters, particularly from the Arabian Peninsula to answer the call.

PI Online filtered and analyzed 439 messages on the Web² commenting on the Bin Ladin tapes, for the period 10/22 to 10/24

Findings:

- Reaction to Bin Ladin’s reference to “mistakes made” ranged from total condemnation of violence and rejection of Bin Ladin’s philosophy at one end of the spectrum, to calls by hardliners for the Mujahidin to close ranks and continue the fight, at the other end.
- As expected, the percentage of posters on Al-Arabiya who were critical of Bin Laden far exceeded those on Al-Jazeera. (67% versus 34%). The most prevalent criticism of Bin Ladin centered around his inability to acknowledge that the mistakes he refers to in his speech were committed by Al-Qaeda under his guidance. Some portrayed the call by Bin Ladin to elevate Islam above nations and tribes as the crux of the message, in order to strike a wedge between the Sunni tribal leaders who joined the fight against Al-Qaeda and their young constituents who are being recruited for jihadi activities.
- Those in the “others” category (20% of the total) made various comments of a general nature that did not support or condemn Bin Ladin’s message: Bin Ladin is an American invention; what’s important is the liberation of Palestine and not Iraq; Islamic unity is the goal; Bin Ladin is an escape mechanism for Bush; Bin Ladin does not recognize mistakes, this video is an American invention staged by a sound-alike. Some aimed their anger at Al-Jazeera for their partial broadcast of the audio, omitting earlier portions of Bin Ladin’s message that hard liners considered favorable to Al-Qaeda.

- Skepticism about the timing of the release of that message and its public broadcast were mentioned in many messages across all categories. Generally, these skeptics viewed the release of the tapes, which they believe have existed for some time, as a reaction to the current backlash against Al Qaeda.

PI Online Conclusion:

The tone and rhetoric of those supporting Bin Ladin seemed to reflect more frustration than conviction. In the past, supporting messages often referred to the accomplishments of the Mujahidin. In contrast, supportive reactions to Monday’s message were little more than brief religious slogans or condemnation of others. PI Online retrieved only three messages mentioning the Mujahidin’s accomplishments. Aside from few Al-Qaeda hardcore supporters, reaction on the street, even by those supporting Bin Laden’s message, seems to be emphasizing Muslim unity rather than Jihadi unity.
